Chairman's Pen

My dear fellow exporters,

The recent monetary policy announced by the Reserve Bank Governor did not lower the interest rate but reduced the SLR marginally. This is unlikely to have any impact on boosting productive activities.

We do believe that the time has now come to relax the stiff interest regime that has been followed by the central bank for sometime now. This would help in combating inflationary pressure by expanding output.

Yours sincerely,

Anupam Shah

Poor government policies and weak public administration continue to suppress economic freedom and entrepreneurial activity. In particular, the rule of law remains weak, corruption is widespread, and the judiciary is subject to political influence. Efforts to improve regulatory efficiency and open markets continue but at a slow pace and with little discernible impact. Measures have been implemented to improve public financial management, and the government continues to offer reforms related to business development and easing the customs process. An overhaul of contract enforcement and remediation is a good step, but much more is needed to foster the institutions necessary for sustained economic growth.

Background

Widespread violence followed the 2007 election when both Mwai Kibaki, who had won the presidency in 2002, and rival candidate Raila Odinga claimed victory. Months of negotiations resulted in a power-sharing arrangement. A new constitution was adopted in August 2010. In November 2011, Kenya launched a military incursion into southern Somalia in response to alleged terrorist activity and kidnappings. Kenya is the transportation, communication, and financial hub of East Africa. Economic growth, hindered for decades by government mismanagement, weak property rights, and corruption, was improving before the post-election instability in 2007 and has picked up again since 2009. The government employs about one-third of the formal labour force, and civil service reform has been slow. Nearly 80 percent of employment is informal. Agriculture accounts for about a quarter of GDP and employs a majority of the population.

Rule of Law

The independence of Kenya's courts is severely compromised, and the judicial system is mired in incompetence, executive interference, and corruption. The process for acquiring land titles is often non-transparent and cumbersome. To root out corruption, the new constitution promulgated in 2010 provides for the devolution of some governing powers to 47 new counties over a three-year period beginning in 2013.

Limited Government

The top income and corporate tax rates are 30 percent. Other taxes include a value-added tax (VAT) and a tax on interest. The overall tax burden amounts to 21.3 percent of GDP. Government spending is equivalent to 29.7 percent of total domestic output. The fiscal climate remains steady. The deficit has fallen slightly to 4.1 percent of GDP, and public debt has fallen to 48.9 percent of GDP.

Regulatory Efficiency

With no minimum capital required, the business start-up process takes 10 procedures, but completing licensing requirements takes more than 100 days and costs over twice the level of average annual income. Much of the labour force is employed in the public sector. Wide swings in the inflation rate have hurt monetary stability. The state continues to regulate prices through agricultural marketing boards and state-owned enterprises.

Open Market

The trade-weighted average tariff rate is quite high at 9.2 percent, and non-tariff barriers including bureaucratic customs procedures further constrain freedom to trade. The investment regime lacks efficiency and transparency. The financial sector remains vulnerable to government influence. The state owns or holds shares in several domestic financial institutions and continues to influence the allocation of credit.
